

Definitions Matter: Hate Crime Legislation, Identity Politics, and Penal Populism

presented at the 25th ASN World Convention

Do Not Cite Without the Permission of the Author

Columbia University, May 5, 2021

Andras L. Pap

Research Professor, Center for Social Sciences Institute for Legal Studies, Budapest

Recurrent Visiting (Adjunct) Professor, Nationalism Studies Program, Central European University, Vienna

Professor, Institute for Business Economics, Eötvös University, Budapest, Hungary

Professor, Ludovika University of Public Service, Budapest, Hungary

pap.andras.laszlo@gmail.com

ABSTRACT

Using Hungary as a case study, and focusing on legislative policies and the practical application of hate crimes, this article shows the various ways legal policy can be misguided in the labyrinth of identity politics, minority protection, and penal populism. The first mistake states can make, the author argues, is not to adopt hate crime legislation. The second error arguably pertains to conceptualizing hate crimes as an identity-protection and not a minority protection mechanism and instrument. The third fallacy the author identifies concerns legislative and practical policies that conceptualize victims based on self-identification and not on the perpetrator's (or the wider community's) potential perception and classification. The fourth flaw concerns the abuse of the concept of hate crime when it is applied in interethnic conflicts when members of minority communities are perpetrators and the victims are members of the majority; and the fifth: institutional discrimination through the systematic underpolicing of hate crimes.

Introduction

Focusing on legislative policies and patterns surrounding the practical application of hate crimes, this article aims at providing a particular piece to the ever complex puzzle board of how law conceptualizes and operationalizes race and ethnicity, as well as ethno-racial identity. The article will begin with introducing the concept, rationale and uniqueness of hate crimes. This is followed by an overview of the history of the development of legislative implementation of hate crime provisions worldwide and a subsequent identification of some essential questions pertaining to the concept and definition of hate crimes which trigger academic interest and professional (practical) debates. Building on these, as well on the author's personal experiences as an academic involved with the work of a human rights NGO-coalition in Hungary, the author sets forth the definitive issues and dilemmas within the concept and definition of hate crimes that are arguably instrumental for theoretically sound and practically efficient policy-making and the cornerstone of law enforcement and judicial practice.

As for methodology, despite references and examples brought from this country, the essay is not an empirical analysis or critical assessment of the legal practice in Hungary, but rather, an inquiry on the general conceptual framework and context of a, as Chakraborti and Garland (2012, 500), put it, “politically and socially significant term [...and] an umbrella concept with the capacity to unite disparate social movements and to direct attention towards the collective experiences of minority groups and the commonalities in their victimization.”

The second part of the essay shows the various ways law (and the state) can be misguided in the labyrinth of identity politics, minority protection, and penal populism. The first mistake states can make, the paper argues is not to adopt hate crime legislation. The second error arguably pertains to conceptualizing hate crimes as an identity-protection and not a minority protection mechanism and instrument. The third fallacy concerns legislative or practical policies that conceptualize victims based on self-identification and not the perpetrator’s (or the wider community’s) potential perception and classification. The fourth issue concerns institutional discrimination through the systematic underpolicing of hate crimes, and the fifth, an abuse of the concept of hate crime when it is applied in interethnic conflicts when members of minority communities are perpetrators and the victims are members of the majority.

The core argument of the article is that hate crimes are and should be minority- and not identity protection mechanisms. The discussion is necessitated by the fact that inappropriate tailoring of criminal measures can both raise rule of law concerns and impede the initial goal of the legislative measure. Although more and more states legislate against hate crimes, and the catalogue of protected characteristics, as well as the formats of the legislation diversify, the rudimentary question of whom hate crime legislation targets is still under consideration in the literature, as well as in the political discourse.

Triggered by experiences from Hungary, a country with an extensive hate crime legislation, but which is followed by a very controversial operationalization, the goal of the article is to present some of the ongoing debates and persistent pitfalls, while it also provides an addition to the scarce literature on the legislation and practice, as well as conceptualisations of hate crime outside of the Western, English-speaking world.

This article considers the question of whom hate crimes legislation should target from a doctrinal perspective, and agrees with Bakalis (2017) in that a principled way of deciding the characteristics of hate crime is required. It will conclude that the core concern of hate crime legislation is with the furthering of the broader minority rights agenda and.

Hate crimes: conceptualizations and definitions

Defining hate crimes is not a straightforward task. Especially for the purposes of this article, which struggles with the paradox that while it raises general points for discussion, talking about legislative policies will always need to have specific jurisdictions and textual language as points of reference. It is often said that hate crimes are more a concept than a strict legal definition. The general idea is simple: the state introduces stricter penal sanctions for criminal activity with a certain specific type of motivation. Thus, hate crimes will entail a base crime, an already punishable criminal offence (such as intimidation, threats, assault, murder, property damage, vandalism, arson, etc.) and a specific motivation of bias, or hatred against certain predefined groups with protected characteristics (such as race, religion, ethnicity, nationality, sexual orientation, disability, etc.). Technically hate crime provisions can constitute separate criminal offences, or take the form of penalty enhancements, aggravating sentencing clauses or aggravating circumstance clauses. Even though “hate” is most commonly used as a signifier for the offense, the intention to cause harm is understood to include motivations led by emotionally neutral bias, that is simply when the victim is selected because of her presumed (either actual or mistaken) membership in a specific group.

Acknowledging apparent similarities and overlaps, academic literature habitually distinguishes between broader and narrower conceptualizations of hate crimes, the latter not including terrorism, genocide and various forms of hate speech, and gender-based violence, and thereby also excluding honor crimes and domestic violence. This article limits the discussion on hate crimes to physically violent behavior targeting members of vulnerable minority communities (identified as such by the offender).

The rationale

The reason why legislators opt for enhanced sanctioning of hate (or bias) crimes is manifold: such violence is always oppressive in the sense that it reconstructs the prevailing structures of oppression and reinforces the boundaries of difference. Hate crimes are message crimes, “reminders” of the victims’ “place” in society. Hate crimes are also considered toxic because the victims are interchangeable (being targeted because of what and not who they are), and since they usually are only ‘at the wrong place at the wrong time’, traditional crime prevention measures are particularly ineffective. Hate crimes may intimidate entire communities through harm caused to individual victims and, by causing unrest, harm society as whole. A further argument for introducing hate crime provisions is that racism, homophobia, xenophobia, etc. are among the beliefs that cannot be tolerated in liberal democracies, and states have a duty to combat these with all applicable means.

Schweppe (2012, 174, 176) argues that hate crimes are the ultimate victim-led offences, as generally criminal law ranks offenses by assessing objective severity (for example, assault, assault causing harm, assault causing serious harm), hate crimes are punished more harshly due to the motivation of the offender, the subjective experience of the victim, and the impact the crime has on the community with which the victim identifies. Thus, hate crimes differ from ‘ordinary crimes’ most of all from the perspective of victims, in that they target offenses where victims were chosen, not because of who they are, but rather because of their actual or presumed membership of a particular group, as for the perpetrator the specific victim is deindividualized, immaterial, and the victims interchangeable.

According to Chakraborti and Garland (2012, 500), there is no universal definition for hate crimes, but leading authority Barbara Perry (2001, 10) argued that “it involves acts of violence and intimidation, usually directed towards already stigmatised and marginalised groups. As such, it is a mechanism of power and oppression, intended to reaffirm the precarious hierarchies that characterise a given social order.”

Critics of hate crime legislation argue that the very concept is built on thought-policing and punishing (more severely) one’s values and bad character, which, principles aside, are actually not necessarily within the control of the individual, thus lack culpability, a general requirement for criminal sanctioning. They also claim that bad character is bound for criticism, not punishment, which is essentially illiberal and violates state’s commitment to political neutrality, and criminal law, being an ultima ratio tool of social control, is notadequate to remedy to social problems. (Swiffen 2018; Weinstein 1992)

Debates and critical issues

As we will see, the concept of hate crimes raises a number of theoretical questions with practical implications: (i) what is the moral and political basis of this heightened legal protection: are hate crimes essentially minority or identity-protection mechanisms? Is there a requirement for the protected characteristic to be inducing some sort of social vulnerability, or any form of victimization related to any form and type of characteristic the individual considers relevant to her personality is worthy of protection? (ii) Even if we single out certain identities, such as race, ethnicity, religion, sexual orientation, does belonging to the majority exclude victimization? In other words, if a group of African Americans attack a white person (because of her being white), should the perpetrators be sentenced more severely? Also, what happens if the group happens to be the majority locally, but a minority in the national setting? Furthermore, can members of right-wing majority extremist hate groups qualify as hate crime victims, if attacked by members of an ethno-racial minority group? (iii) How should membership in the predefined protected groups be ascertained: is the declaration of the identity of the victim, or the, potentially mistaken, perception of the offender or the majority community matter? (iv) Furthermore, how are open-ended lists or vaguely defined criteria for protected characteristics, as often and laudably applied in anti-discrimination legislative frameworks compatible with the principle of “nullum crimen sine lege”?

It should be emphasized that legislators are not in an easy position, as group sensitivities, the complexities of identity politics and the struggle for symbolic recognition create a political minefield. In what follows, the article will first elaborate some of the above issues and questions, and subsequently provide a list of recommendations for legislators how to avoid political, ethical and conceptual mistakes.

The history of hate crime legislation

The concept (and policy) of hate crimes has triggered fierce debates in legal theory and criminology since the 1990s, with dozens of monographs and edited volumes and hundreds of articles being published on this topic (see for example Aaronson 2014; Altschiller 2015; Bean 2017; Chakraborti 2010; Chakraborti and Garland 2014; Hall et al. 2015; Hudson 2009; Jacobs and Potter 2001; Jenness and Grattet 2004; Kelly 1993; Levin and McDevitt 1993; Perry 2001). Yet this academic activity has failed to generate a similarly intense public debate. In fact, hate crime legislation is an international success story, with more and more states adopting such provisions, and it is safe to say that it has reached the level of international custom.

International organizations such as the OSCE and the EU have been committed advocates to promote hate crime legislation.ⁱ According to the United Nations Interregional Crime and Justice Research Institute, LIGHT ON: Investigating and Reporting Online Hate Speech, Training Manual (UNIEMI, n.d., 7)

“the concept of hate crime firstly emerged in Europe in the year 1990. In the Copenhagen Document, States participating in the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe (CSCE) pledged to take effective measures to provide adequate defense against acts that can constitute incitement to violence against individuals or groups based on national, racial, ethnic or religious discrimination, hostility or hate. ... the term hate crime was officially used for the first time in 2003 by the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE), at the Ministerial Council Meeting in Maastricht, when States underlined the key role that hate crime legislation plays in ensuring that the criminal justice system has the authority to investigate, prosecute and impose sentences for crimes fuelled by intolerance and discrimination. In 2010, the Astana Declaration issued at the end of the OSCE High-Level Conference on Tolerance and Non-discrimination reiterated commitments and concerns about hate crimes, including those based on racism or xenophobia.”

Hate crime legislation seems to be a standard, though not universal, part of criminal legislation. For example, in the US, the federal government and 48 states have now adopted different variations of hate crime statutes. (Walker 2017, 1417)

The first wave of hate crime legislation was introduced to combat violence motivated by racism and xenophobia. While in the United States these laws emerged out of the civil rights movement, in Europe it was a response to the victimization of ethnic groups during the Second World War. Following their institutionalization, and as a result of claims made by other minority groups, western democracies further expanded the catalogue of protected grounds (Godzisz n.d., 1; Gerstenfeld 2004). Following race, ethnicity and religion, sexual orientation, gender identity, and disability, alternative subcultures (e.g., Garland 2011), homelessness (e.g., Newburn and Rock 2004) and sex workers (e.g., O’Doherty 2011), age, political affiliation, and personal appearance was recognized by legislatures and academic literature. The boundaries of hate crime have also been tested by Gail Mason's (2013) scholarship on violence against pedophiles. Whom to protect?

As we can see, most of the questions pertain to the issue of whom should hate crime legislation address.

Schweppe (2012, 177, 185) lists the most commonly used protected classes across a wide range of hate crimes legislation as: age, citizenship, class, color, disability, economic status, ethnicity, family responsibility, gender, matriculation, membership of labor organization, marital status, national origin, personal appearance, political orientation or affiliation, race, religion, sex, sexual orientation, social status, physical infirmity, drug addiction, criminal record, pedophile tendencies, mental infirmity, membership of the travelling community, marriage and civil partnership, pregnancy and maternity, being a physician engaging in performing abortions.

Groups included in hate crime legislation have specific ‘tools of political and legal persuasion: a well-recognized history of oppression; an established currency in human rights discourse; the backing of an influential social movement; and the capacity to establish empirical credibility for the targeted violence they experience’ (Mason 2013, 162) This has led to fierce political and academic debates concerning the “hierarchy of legitimate victims”.

Citing Jacobs and Potter (2001) Schweppe (2012, 179) observes that hate crime laws are appealing to politicians

“Except for the inclusion of sexual orientation, politicians faced a no lose proposition. By supporting hate crime legislation, they could please the advocacy group without antagonizing any lobbyists on the other side ... without making hard budgetary choices. The hate crime laws provided an opportunity to denounce two evils—crime and bigotry—without offending any constituencies or spending any money.”

Arguing against the inclusion of the occupation of police officer in hate crimes statutes, as advocated under the “Blue Lives Matter”-movement, Walker (2017, 1422, 1427) warns about the dangers of overexpansion of hate crime laws emerging from increasing advocacy efforts by special interest groups leading to a slippery slope of legal favoritism. She claims that occupation does not belong in a hate crime statute, which should be reserved for victimization based on fundamental features of identity with some shared self-consciousness or collective identity, which also implicate societal fissure lines, or “divisions that run deep in the social history of a culture.” Hate crime statutes, which are largely expressive, she argues, are only meant to target prejudice with a recognized social context. For example, in the case of violence against police officers, there is no evidence suggesting that these crimes would be underreported or insufficiently investigated. Thus, to continue her argument, lacking a minority protection justification, such expansion of hate crime statutes is unfounded.

Schweppe (2012, 179, 185, 191) on the other hand argues that developing ‘moral fault lines’ in distinguishing between victim groups and the failure to include demands for recognition actually amounts to exclusion and leads to the further marginalization of the groups and reinforcing public prejudices. She makes the case for promoting social equality through the criminal justice system and reiterates that creating hierarchies of victims in hate crimes statutes, the criminal justice system actually discriminates arbitrarily between social groups. In line with this, from the perspective of sexual citizenship, Richardson and May (1999) argue that not including sexual orientation in hate crime legislation means that gay people are denied full citizenship as the heteronormative culturally biased society reinforces and reproduces the vision of gay people as non-deserving. Godzisz and Pudzianowska (2016, p. 176) hold that an opposition “to the inclusion of sexual orientation in hate crime laws can be seen as part of the general anti- LGB (or homophobic) discourse.”

Chakraborti and Garland (2012) argue that hate crime should be seen through the lens of vulnerability and difference rather than group identity and history of marginalization, and this will enable to also tackle crimes targeting people because of their alternative looks (e.g. Goths), or homelessness, as hate crimes.

The subsequent part of the essay shows the various ways law (and the state) can be misguided in the labyrinth of identity politics, minority protection, and penal populism.

No 1: Neglecting hate crime legislation

Philosophical challenges aside, the conceptualization of hate crimes raises numerous technical questions. For example, can victims and perpetrators be members of the same group? What happens if ultra-orthodox Jews attack non-religious Jews, say, for not observing the Sabbath? If we recognize domestic violence as a form of hate crime, do we exclude same sex partnership violence? Also, how should non-typical, opportunistic victim-selection models be dealt with: does a perpetrator who specializes on robbing Chinese small-business owners, presuming that they carry a larger amount of cash, meet the criteria for racial bias? What about robbers targeting customers leaving gay bars in intolerant societies, because they have a reason to believe that reporting to the police will be less likely in order to avoid homophobic stigmatization? Is this homophobic hate crime? What about “thrill seeking” offenders, where the motivation (say, for spraying swastikas on buildings) roots in a desire for excitement, and provocation, as an antidote for boredom? Given all these, should not the state simply opt for not having hate crime legislation in place at all? Let us bear in mind: hate crimes presuppose a preexisting base crime, thus, all hate crime offenses will be sanctioned, it is merely this, extra, and not entirely uncontroversial symbolic element is at stake.

An adequate answer may be that the genie has already left the bottle; hate crime legislation had become a part of international standards and good practices for policing and criminal justice.ⁱⁱ For example, by using the theory of Europeanization as an explanatory frame (and ‘fundamentals first’ as an operational guideline), Godzisz (2019) explains how hate crime laws are enacted as part of the democratization process, with the support of the OSCE and NGOs, and under EU influence.

To eradicate preexisting legislation or to disregard soft law (and in the case of the European Union actual legal commitments), recommendations and guidelines by professional organizations, NGO’s, etc. is a blatant rejection of firmly established demands for progressive criminal justice, where talk of the town has for long now been about how to monitor hate crimes and the debate whether or not to have such legislation is long passé.

Once it has been established that it is the Zeitgeist to have hate crime provisions, this leaves us only with the question of how to do it right. It needs to be emphasized, that the failure to include a specific community among the protected groups logically cannot be equated with discrimination, as the symbolic and political decision to recognize atrocities against certain groups as a more serious crime, does not devalue other groups participating in the politics of justice.

Misapprehension No 2: Conceptualizing hate crimes as identity-protection and not as a minority protection mechanism and instrument

Consider the following cases in Hungary, where, with an extremely low immigration ratio, especially from outside Europe, the Roma are practically the only visible ethno-racial minority. In March 2009 in Miskolc, a city with a high Roma population, around the time when a series of targeted murders against Roma was ongoing in the country, members of the extreme right-wing paramilitary group the Hungarian Guard – an association later dissolved by the Supreme Court for carrying out racist activities – were marching around in different Hungarian villages nearby. Text messages circulated among the local Roma, alleging that skinheads were planning attacks. At around 1 a.m. a cars cruising in a Roma neighborhood were attacked by 25-40 (Roma) locals who assumed that the people in the cars were skinheads or members of the Hungarian Guard. The perpetrators had no firearms and they used wooden sticks and stones.

The damage caused in a car was 104,000 HUF (approx. 350 EUR). Eleven perpetrators were identified by the police (the rest fled and were never identified) and taken into pre-trial detention. A wooden stick was found in the crime scene with the sentence “Death to the Hungarians” written on it, however, it has not been clarified by whom the stick was prepared or used. One of the victims had right-wing ties, and the passengers carried several litres of gasoline with them. (Index.hu 2013a) In the case, which Petra Bárd (2014, 36) calls “fear crime,” the court found all perpetrators guilty in ‘violence against member of a community’, some getting six years imprisonment (Gaál 2010). In 2013, the appellate courtⁱⁱⁱ changed the legal qualification of the case to ‘antisocial behavior’, a significantly lower penalty. The appellate court found that members of the Hungarian Guard and skinheads are not protected by the hate crime statute, while “Hungarians” are, but the two are not necessarily synonymous and there was insufficient evidence of racist motivation.

In November 2009 a similar incident happened in Sajóabony, a small town close to Miskolc, where following a public forum organized by the racist far-right Jobbik party, some 100 members of the New Hungarian Guard (the “successor” of the dissolved Hungarian Guard, see above) were attacked by Roma locals; one of their cars was seriously damaged by wooden sticks and axes with the passengers suffering light injuries. The victims claimed that their Hungarian ethnicity was the cause of the attack, while the defendants argued that they only wanted to protect their families from the neo-Nazi paramilitary vigilantes. In 2013 nine Roma defendants sentenced up to 4 years imprisonment. This time the appellate court^{iv} raised the sentences (Index.hu 2013b), despite the fact that in a 2011 case involving a physical assault against persons who belonged to the far-right paramilitary Hungarian Guard, the Supreme Court took the position that “members of groups established in opposition to national, ethnic, racial, religious or other social groups, and in obvious conflict with legal provisions, clearly cannot enjoy special criminal law protections.”^v Although the high court is committed to the position that hate crime provisions cannot be applied to members of hate groups,^{vi} judicial practice is uneven, and in 2015, the Kúria (formerly Supreme Court)^{vii} reiterated that members of the majority community can be victims of hate crimes.

According to the Hungarian Civil Liberties Union, the aforementioned practice fuels worries about cases where Roma are accused of racially motivated hate crimes

“whereas Roma are the main target of racist violence in Hungary ... [and at the same time], hate crimes against Roma are systematically under-classified if procedures are at all started ... cases get thrown out during inspection. The ... Court failed to take into account a long history of exclusion, severe discrimination, and inequality that affects the Roma a population that had been traumatized by a series of murders by racist extremists.(HCLU 2012)

The Hungarian courts' take on majority-minority dynamics is not out of line with international practice. The British Association of Chief Police Officers' tactical guidance (ACPO 2005) defines hate crimes as “any incident perceived by the victim to be motivated by hate or prejudice.”

This article argues that nevertheless, the second fallacy legislators can make is classifying and conceptualizing hate crimes as instruments that protect core identities, regardless of whether the personality traits around which these identity claims evolve lead to marginalization and vulnerability. An important and defining characteristic of identity politics is that certain crucial identities are worthy of recognition and symbolic appreciation for two reasons: (i) for dignity-reasons, because these are simply essential elements of the core human personality, and (ii) for equality reasons, due to the current, or at least historical experience of systematic marginalization that occurred in relation to these identities.

Recognition is, thus, intertwined with claims for symbolic justice. The peculiarity of criminal law, however, is that it is the most intrusive form of social engineering, and it has always been understood as the last resort, an “ultima ratio” legal (and social) control measure. This article argues that even if we allow criminal law to be a tool of social policy and social justice, it should only be allowed to be utilized when combatting actual marginalization and documented vulnerability, it should therefore be conceptualized as a minority protection mechanism and not part of the broad stock of social and political tools available to recognize core identities.

As Heyes (2016) puts it, “identity politics starts from analyses of oppression to recommend, variously, the reclaiming, redescription, or transformation of previously stigmatized accounts of group membership.” The proliferation of protected characteristics, arguably actually transforms identity politics into a form of penal populism. Bottoms (1995, 40), referring to it as ‘populist punitiveness’ saw it as the “notion of politicians tapping into and using for their own purposes, what they believe to be the public’s generally punitive stance”(also see Pratt 2007, 2).

But again, criminal law should be applied in the most restrictive way only, remedying or preventing further marginalization of members of vulnerable minority communities. Several technical consequences emerge from this: (i) the prudent and theoretically consistent road to follow for states is to declare vulnerability (of protected groups and characteristics) as a requirement for heightened criminal sanctioning, and this should be made explicit in legislative wording. (ii) Legislators should enumerate all potential protected characteristics that are habitually connected to the vulnerability. (iii) States should also be prepared to address political and ethical questions raised by activists and advocates pertaining to legal conceptualization; and (iv) legal conceptualization should nevertheless address the question of mistaken identities and victimization by association.

(i) Vulnerability – as a tool to define and accentuate “minorityness”

Let us first explore the concept of “vulnerability”. The United Nations Department of Economic and Social Affairs defines vulnerability as a state of high exposure to risks and uncertainties, in combination with a reduced ability to protect or defend oneself against those risks and uncertainties and cope with their negative consequences, describing both a universal aspect of the human condition and a peculiar relational condition of individuals or groups (Macioce 2018, 474). Group vulnerability is related to social, historical, and institutional forces, and prejudice and stigma can perpetuate the vulnerability of a particular group of people, and affect the individual enjoyment of fundamental rights and social goods. For example Macioce (2018, 474) shows how in D.H. and Others v. the Czech Republic, a case concerning Roma students who were assigned to special schools for children with learning difficulties where they received an inferior education based on a simplified curriculum, the European Court of Human Rights found^{viii} that the applicants suffered discrimination when denied their right to education, and stated that Roma have become a specific type of vulnerable minority as “a result of their turbulent history and constant uprooting.” The Court also held that people with mental disabilities are a particularly vulnerable group in society, due to the considerable discrimination they suffered in the past, where the main indicator of such a particular vulnerability is the harm produced by historical forms of prejudice, by misrecognition, and by patterns of cultural devaluation that produce specific forms of discrimination, social disadvantage, or material deprivation.

The concept of vulnerability attracted a considerable group of enthusiasts, who see it as a novel and promising way to encapsulate substantive equality, and even a means to shift policies of recognition from protection to empowerment (Malloy 2014, Macioce (2018, 481) and Young (1997)) as well as reversing relations of privilege and oppression between majority and minorities. According to Macioce (2018, 482)

“this approach blurs the opposition between majority and minorities, so as to avoid (or to lessen) populist criticisms about the politics of recognition: Identities and group needs are considered only to the extent that they give rise to some specific vulnerability. From this point of view, majorities and minorities are on the same side of the river, because many factors can produce conditions of vulnerability, and every individual can find him/herself in a condition of vulnerability. No resources are taken away from the majority for the sake of minority recognition, nor is there an opposition between insiders and outsiders: Both can be vulnerable, depending on specific situations.”

Pertaining to criminal law, Chakraborti and Garland (2012, 505), adopt the definition for vulnerability insofar as it refers to the perception of exposure to danger, a loss of control over the situation and a perceived inadequate capacity to resist the direct and indirect consequences of victimization, adding that it will typically involve groups or individuals who are impoverished, disenfranchised or subject to discrimination, intolerance, subordination and stigma. The instructive feature of vulnerability is that it points to the situational nature of othering, and underlies that it stems not primarily for group membership and identity, but a particular situation. Applying the concept in hate crime legislation allows to exclude the abuse or disfiguration of hate crime legislation if it were to protect members of the majority community, even say racist hate groups when being victimized by minorities. Furthermore, should this be the legislator’s intent, following Chakraborti and Garland (2012, 500, 501), by moving away from identity, groupism and a fixation on grand patterns of oppression, it allows for a more inclusive framework for victims and an entire reconceptualization of hate crime victimization.

Chakraborti and Garland (2012, 504) also point out that traditional hate crime frameworks can fail to recognize the diversity within the broad labels that are used to denote categories of hate crime victim, citing Ahn Lin they emphasize the rich diversity of ethnic groups associated with the term and label ‘Asian American’ (Asian Indians, Cambodians, Chinese, Filipinos, Hmong, Japanese, Koreans, Samoans, Thai and Vietnamese), whose experiences are homogenized by scholars and policy makers – similarly to the overbroad categories of BME (black and minority ethnic), LGBT (lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender) and “disabled” communities. They also underline that “accounts of hate crime need to be more attuned to the intersectional nature of identity. For example, the harassment of lesbians may be caused by homophobia and by misogyny ... the higher level of victimization incurred by male-to-female (MtF), as opposed to female-to-male (FtM) transgender people has been explained by gender oppression.”

Chakraborti and Garland (2012, 503) argue that rather than conceptualizing hate crime victimization through group identity, perceived vulnerability and ‘difference’ should feature more prominently in the ways in which scholars and policy-makers across the world think about hate crime – in order to enable overlooked and vulnerable victims of targeted violence to receive the recognition. Such groups would include the homeless, elderly and isolated victims, people with mental health issues or drug and alcohol dependency, members of alternative subcultures such as goths or nu-metallers, sex workers or foreign nationals, refugees, asylum seekers, migrant workers or overseas students (see Blake 2001; Garland 2011; Jenness and Grattet 2004; Herek and Berrill 1992; Newburn and Rock 2004; O’Doherty 2011; Sherry 2010; Wellman 2006) who, “lacking either the support of lobby groups or political representation, and typically seen as ‘undesirables’, criminogenic or less worthy than other more ‘legitimate’ or credible victim groups,” and are commonly excluded from view. This would provide enhanced protection to victims stereotypically perceived as ‘easy’ or ‘soft’ targets. It needs to be underlined that vulnerability is not a panacea. Chakraborti and Garland (2012, 507) recognize that the term is not entirely uncontroversial, as

“references to the disabled as vulnerable, for example, have been criticized for being inherently disablist in automatically conflating disability with vulnerability... and for casting victims of disablist hate crime as for its connotations of weakness and make reference to the inherently paternalistic process of powerful majority group members designating another as vulnerable as part of their service provision responsibilities.”

Furthermore, Hruschka and Leboeuf (2019) point out how in the legal and policy discourse on asylum and migration,^{ix} while ‘vulnerability’ has the advantage of contextualizing migration policy, as it draws attention to the concrete experiences lived by migrants, refugees and asylum seekers, it also has exclusionary effects which may amount to a restriction on accessing existing rights if actual access to these pre-existing rights is restricted only to those deemed vulnerable. (For more, see Atak et al. 2018; ECRE 2017; IOM 2017; “Vulnerabilities” 2015). The introduction of discretionary decision-making competences in immigration and refugee law not only makes the process less transparent, but also relativizes “need” and worthiness, reifies victimhood and fuels a “victimhood/vulnerability Olympics.”

It is also problematic that the introduction of the term led to an increase in the number of socio-political and legal categories that actually lack a common definition and systematic understanding. “For example asylum seekers with mental disorders, for example, are recognized as vulnerable under Polish and Italian national law, but not under French and Spanish law. Victims of human trafficking are considered vulnerable in the context of the asylum procedures in Belgium and Greece, but not in Ireland or Croatia. EU Member States seem to apply their own understanding of the concept of ‘vulnerability’.” (Hruschka and Leboeuf 2019, 3)

As Hruschka and Leboeuf (2019, 3) point out, the imprecise meaning of the term is further blurred by the fact that it may refer to questions of status, as well as to specific personal profiles. In the last reform of the CEAS directives in 2016, the European Commission proposed to replace ‘vulnerability’ with ‘special reception needs,’ (European Commission 2016) which represents a shift from a categorization among refugees, migrants and asylum seekers asking ‘who is ‘vulnerable?’’ to a procedural approach focusing on ‘how are vulnerabilities being addressed?’)

Despite the points above, this article argues that the “vulnerability”-criterion is nevertheless adequate and appropriate in the field of hate crimes, because there is an important difference between asylum law and criminal law in the context of narrowing the scope of applicability. In the former, it actually leads to restricting the beneficiaries of certain preexisting rights and protections, while in the latter this cannot happen, since, as argued before, criminal law provides a heightened, but foremost symbolic protection to victims of crimes not specifically recognized as hate crimes, therefore setting forth limitations for collective and individual criteria does not create a zero-sum game, nor a group of “non-deserving” victims.

The claim of this article is that hate crimes should be defined as particular minority protection instruments, where vulnerability is a core and unique concept used to define the protected groups, but it should not be applied on the level of scrutinizing individual victimization. In other words, vulnerability should be applied to accentuate and define the marginalized minority condition that triggers heightened, symbolic criminal protection. Actual, personal vulnerability of the victims could and should be institutionalized as a penalty enhancement, or aggravating sentencing or circumstance clause, but it should not be the prism through which hate crimes are conceptualized. Vulnerability, it is asserted here, should serve the purpose of defining, explaining and elaborating, but not narrowing the scope and concept of hate crime protection, a quintessentially minority protection mechanism. While, as it will be elaborated below, even explicitly racially motivated violence by members of the majority community should be excluded from hate crime conceptualization, vulnerability may serve as a tool for fine-tuning the concept of “minoritiness” and explaining the source of heightened protection. Thereby members of a community, which is in a structurally disadvantaged position, and marginalized on the national level, but which forms the majority, and is in a dominant position on the regional level, may lack vulnerability in the specific context, and its members can conceptually be perpetrators of hate crimes. This article endorses, thus, the inclusion of vulnerability in statutory definition making, insofar as it is applied for the enumeration of the protected groups. The claim is that instead of ‘difference,’ ‘unqualified and undefined vulnerability,’ ‘group hostility,’ ‘disadvantage’ (See Al-Hakim 2015) or ‘equality’, the rationale to who the victims of hate crime should be are: members of predefined disadvantaged minority communities, where some sort of vulnerability is also detectable. In a slight disagreement with Bakalis, and Harel and Parchomovsky (1999), a socially disadvantaged position in general should be the basis of hate crime legislation, accentuating a broader societal concern for the specifically vulnerable. “Social identity”, similarly to a broad notion of “equality” are insufficient grounds for heightened protection under criminal law, as access to the criminal justice process is in theory guaranteed to all victims of crime in a democratic society governed by the rule of law. And criminal law is not a tool tailored to encourage citizens to think of themselves as members of identity groups or to ‘celebrate difference’, even if Bakalis (p. 732) correctly points out that identity groups seeking recognition in hate crime statutes all have in common that they “have historically been oppressed in one way or another, and hence require the strong arm of the law to enable them to lead free and equal lives,” and correctly refers to Solanke in arguing that ‘equality law is designed to address oppression rather than just promote diversity’. However, hate crimes statutes should not be seen as simply parts of the broader equality agenda, where the list of protected characteristics may, and, arguably should be much longer than those to whom additional protection under criminal law is afforded. As to be argued below, members of the majority community need not be included in hate crime protections.

To rephrase Bakalis, a doctrinally solid hate crime statute needs to provide clear justifications and normative explanations for the additional harm or wrong involved in the targeted offences, and also be able fit within traditional criminal law structures, which require a narrowly tailored legislative phrasing and a reflection of the ultima ratio character and doctrine of criminal legislation. Vague formulations for groups with recognizable justice needs and open ended lists, along a wide discretion for judges to establish “vulnerability” without a legislative predetermination and enumeration of the protected groups do not meet these criteria.

The position argued in this article, is thus incompatible with Bakalis (p. 734) who claims that “If a characteristic has been deemed to be sufficiently persecuted or subjugated that it requires civil law protection under the Equality Act ..., then it is justifiable in principle to extend this protection through the criminal law.” It is asseverated here that criminal law, in fact needs more and can only encapsulate less.

The key to hate crime legislation is the genuine impact it has on victims, in particular its effect to participate in public life. As Carmody et al point out (p. 22 and 27), those who have experienced hate offences report a wider and longer-lasting range of negative psychological impacts such as fear, anger, shock, loss of confidence, sadness, depression, suicidal ideation, anxiety, panic attacks, trouble sleeping and/or concentrating, nervousness, feelings of vulnerability, hyper-sensitivity in relation to repeat victimization, powerlessness and social withdrawal. Furthermore, strategies to avoid repeat victimization impede and inhibit the exercise of minority identity as the terroristic effect of hate crime often leads to self-segregation and self-imposing limitations on participation in public life.

In sum, here a theoretical framework and principled rationale for hate crime legislation is advocated which arguably can best be accommodated within criminal law principles.

(ii) Enumeration

As Bakalis (p. 721) points out, a separate issue concerns what should be done once the rationale for victimhood has been established – should the identities be ‘exclusive’ or ‘inclusive’? An exclusive approach requires the victims to be chosen in advance by legislation that names them specifically. An inclusive would gives discretion to a judge or jury to decide in each case that comes before it whether the particular victim fell into the general category of hate crime victimhood. Schweppe (2012) argues for the latter, and advocates an open definition for the victims of hate crime, recommending that the jury should be given discretion to convict defendants whenever it can be shown that they exhibited ‘group hostility’ towards a victim because of their personal characteristics, which they share with an identifiable social group. This article argues otherwise.

Following from above it is contended here that legislators should enumerate all potential (mostly visible, immutable, fundamental) protected characteristics that are habitually connected to the aforementioned vulnerability. It needs to be underlined that criminal law is very different from anti-discrimination law. In anti-discrimination legislation, the more protected characteristics included the better, the more inclusive and potent the law will be, in fact even open ended lists are progressive, allowing to outlaw discrimination for previously undefined “other” characteristics. In criminal law, less is more: legal certainty requires narrowly tailored, thoroughly circumscribed definitions, otherwise the ‘nullum crimen sine lege’, ‘no crime without law (legislation)’ principle^x would be violated. Thus, criminal legislation should resist the identity politics driven race and lobby for recognizing more and more identities, and should not give in to accusations of unethical or politically insensitive creation of a hierarchy of valued identities. Being an investment banker maybe an identity a violent glob-crit protester targets with hate, yet, the general vulnerability of the group cannot be established. Even if neoliberal economists are being attacked by an angry mob of protesters, it is unwise to qualify this as a hate crime based on bias targeting political opinion. Let us always bear in mind: violence and vandalism is a criminal offence and victims are not unprotected or abandoned even if no special hate crime provisions are applied in their case. If we expand the list of protected characteristics we actually marginalize the vulnerable ones relativizing their vulnerability.

It needs to be added that it poses a technical, codification challenge for vulnerability to be included in the statutory criminal provision, as, due to the above elaborated requirement of strict conceptualization in criminal law, the actual assessment and circumscription of such groups and communities should not be left to the judiciary or law enforcement agencies, but the legislator needs to take up this role: relying on social science evidence in a way similar to how “country risk assessment” is set forth by government agencies in asylum procedures.

The rationale for advocating a strict enumeration-policy is also supported by arguments referring to the increased operational burden on the criminal justice system, most of all on law enforcement agents who would then have less guidance for navigating in the maze of conceptualization. An even more robust argument, however pertains to the moral and political responsibility of the legislator to take side in the politics of justice and the ‘hierarchies of hate’.

(iii) Preparing for a sensitive public discourse

Continuing the stance set out above states, or rather governments, should be prepared to address political and ethical questions raised by activists and advocates inquiring about the peculiarity of standards applied in this field of criminal justice, and pointing to the asymmetry in relation to other fields of law and public policy. For example, race, ethnicity, nationality, religion, political opinion, and even sexual orientation or gender identity may have different meanings and repercussions in anti-discrimination law, naturalization, asylum law or affirmative action than in the field of criminal law.

(iv) Mistaken classification and victimization by association

Finally, it is important to emphasize that although textual language needs to be strict and narrow in requiring vulnerability and setting forth protected characteristics, it has been a habitual practice in anti-discrimination and hate crime practice to extend protections in specific cases for mistaken identities and victims associated with members of the protected groups. Hence, if a “straight ally” participating in an LGBT march is attacked by homophobic perpetrators, the application of hate crime provisions ought to be in place, just as when a tourist from Mexico is taken for Roma in Eastern Europe and attacked by far-right extremists.

Misapprehension No 3: Applying hate crimes for minority offenders against majority victims

In this text it has been argued that states should conceptualize hate crimes as minority protection instruments. The Hungarian cases discussed demonstrate the absurdity of applying hate crime provisions in cases involving violence against members belonging to the majority community. It has been reiterated that even if the victims were not members of hate groups, and a motivation including animosity towards them as members of the majority community could be established, lacking the second layer of scrutiny pertaining to vulnerability, this should not suffice for classification as hate crimes. It has been argued that the additional protection afforded by criminal law to specific membership in these groups does not root in the centrality of these identities, nor in the immutability of these characteristics alone, rather because these personality traits are useful signifiers for historical or structural patterns of marginalization. Let us be reminded again: all offenders, including minority perpetrators (with racist motivations) will be facing criminal sanctions, only the additional, special moral and political message included in hate crimes will be absent. We should be aware of the temptations of what Lynne Haney (2011, 2016) calls penal nationalism, a special form of penal populism, which can equate punitiveness with a national sovereignty and protection along a variety of forms for reimagining community and the lines of social exclusion.

Admittedly, there may be legitimate arguments supporting the inclusion of, say, local minorities (who are members of the majority nationally) within the symbolic recognition hate crime provisions. However, even if individual vulnerabilities may be present in their case, a collective systematic marginalization in the criminal justice system would not be present, nor the need for additional symbolic recognition, since racist violence against them will be naturally condemned by the majority community.

This is one of the reasons why the exclusion of, say, racist motivation by members of minority communities against members of the majority community cannot amount to discrimination, as such protections should be reserved to provide compensatory, symbolic protections to groups prevented from full participation in public life. (Particularly difficult cases involve attacks against Jews in Israel or blacks in South Africa.) It needs to be underlined that this conceptualization needs to be made explicit by the legislator, which can then be balanced by authorizing the judiciary to apply more severe individualized sanctioning under “ordinary” criminal provisions for the base crimes committed with abhorrent motivation using the artillery of penalty enhancements.

Hard cases

Legislators and policy makers should, however, be prepared to accept: hate crimes may not be a meaningful concept in certain “hard cases”, say, in gang-related interethnic violence where the minority/vulnerability dimension, which actually should trigger the entire concept cannot be conceptualized or operationalized. In a similar vein, it may simply be futile to apply hate crime provisions for, say, a (clearly racially motivated) assault on an Armenian citizen by an Azerbaijani in Switzerland, where the marginalization and vulnerability of the victim is impossible in their initial meaning.

To sum up, this article advocates a legislative (and judicial) policy that conceptualizes hate crimes as a minority protection mechanism. Again, it should be underlined that the reason justifying the exclusion of certain groups and certain criminal behavior from hate crime conceptualization lies in the fact that an analogy for protected characteristics in anti-discrimination law, where the broadest possible list is desirable, is false, as any form of violence against members of groups not recognized as non-hate crime victims will still be sanctioned by ordinary criminal law.

Misapprehension No 4: Allowing institutional discrimination through systematic underpolicing of hate crimes against minority victims

It needs to be emphasized that the gravity of the misapprehension of applying hate crimes to minority offenders is further accentuated by the rampant failure to properly diagnose and apply hate crime provisions in general; and practically overwhelmingly in the classic cases when members of minority/vulnerable groups are the victims, and the perpetrators are not. Given the fact that law enforcement authorities actually fail to provide a public service set forth by law, this actually amounts to institutional discrimination. Indeed, one may even argue that the systematic underpolicing of hate crimes amounts to a form of systematic inequality that justifies the very creation of hate crimes. The phenomenon of institutional discrimination is widely documented by domestic and international organizations. (Bárd 2017). To go back to the Hungarian case, one example from the Working Group Against Hate Crimes (GYEM) (2013) – a unique NGO-coalition established in 2012 to join forces for a more effective state response to hate crimes in Hungary – published (Dombos et al. 2014) an overview of 24 cases, showing how law enforcement officers systematically fail to protect victims of hate crimes. The systemic failures surface in four dimensions: (i) under-classification of hate crimes, (ii) failure to undertake law-enforcement action, and (iii) failure to take investigative measures.

As regards (i), under-classification refers to the phenomenon that hate/bias motivation is disregarded during the procedure and so, even if due to the well-founded suspicion of a crime, a criminal procedure is initiated, a more lenient provision of the Penal Code is applied. As for (ii), police often fail to take the necessary measures at far-right, extremist assemblies directed against vulnerable groups, even if there is sufficient amount of evidence to suggest that an infringement of law took place. Whilst in relation to point (iii), it appears to be a general problem that the investigative authorities fail to question the witnesses, collect the CCTV recordings prior to their deletion, to conduct searches or background investigations into the motives to learn of the social networks and lifestyle of the offenders (whether they have extremist symbols on their walls, what type of comments they make in public fora) to uncover the motives of the crime and investigate their social media.

When it comes to underpolicing hate crimes Hungarian practice is fairly typical, nevertheless, for example, between October 2015 and January 2017, within 15 months, the European Court of Human Rights found Hungary three times^{xi} to be in violation of the European Convention on Human Rights in relation to handling hate crime incidents. In all of the cases the Roma victims' fundamental rights were violated due to the omissions of law-enforcement authorities in hate crime procedures.

Misapprehension No 5: Conceptualizing victims based on self-identification and not by the perpetrator's (or the wider community's) potential perception and classification

It is corollary to underline that not only should the crimes be minority protection, and not mere identity protection instruments, it should also be made explicit that in determining criminal responsibility and culpability, the perception and classification of the perpetrator (and as a prime point of reference the perception of the wider community and society) should matter when determining bias and membership in the protected group.

A similar argument against identity-based hate crime conceptualization is made by Schweppe (2012, 181) who points to the 'disabled' label in legislation, where the victims themselves may not in fact view themselves as such, but rather as 'differently-abled.'

Classification and identification principles have crucial procedural ramifications. First, privacy and data protection. Under European privacy standards, data pertaining to the most commonly identified protected characteristics, such as race, ethnicity, sexual orientation, medical condition, etc, are sensitive data the processing of which either requires anonymization or the written permission of the data subject. This article argues, however, that data, i.e. information that does not pertain to identification, that is the data subject providing statements concerning her sensitive status, but what concerns another person, the perpetrator's perception and classification, need not meet such stringent protection. When it comes to protecting members of vulnerable communities from discrimination or criminal victimization, their identification is not relevant. What matters is the perpetrator's (accurate or mistaken) classification/perception-based bias. The victim's identification as a member of a protected group should be relevant insofar as a criminal investigation's initial focus goes, thus if a victim claims to be a victim of a hate crime due to her identity, the police should always classify the case as a potential hate crime and follow the intricate protocol to substantiate the investigation on these grounds.^{xii} The victim's identity as member of a protected group however is neither a necessary, nor a sufficient criterion for the verification of the crime. Just because a victim identifies as a member of a protected group, that does not prove the bias motivation of the crime. Nor is it a requirement for a hate crime to be recognized as such for the victim to identify with the protected group. Not only because of the aforementioned cases of victimization by mistake and association, but also, because there are not any, and nor is there a need for objective standards in criminal law to establish objective criteria for protected group-membership. Investigative authorities in most cases do not have, and should not have means to "verify and validate" what it means to be Jewish or gay for an anti-Semitic or homophobic incident, and according to a thick privacy interpretation, are not even authorized to ask the victim about these personality traits: what matters is the perpetrator's perception and bias. When lacking a voluntary declaration as regards the identity of the victim, in my opinion, the only question the police may ask is whether the victim would think that the perpetrator could have chosen her due to a presumed membership in the protected group. When it comes to standards of evidence for bias and the role of subjective vs. objective classifications, the investigative authorities need to establish two facts: (i) whether the victim could have been perceived by the perpetrator as member of the protected group – for this the general public's commonly held perception can be established and applied, and (ii) whether actual bias towards the group and the victim in particular can be established. This latter is the most difficult part of hate crime investigation, but there is a plethora of national and international guidelines for investigative protocols.

Unfortunately none of the dozens of guidelines and recommendations by international organizations which could harmonize legislation, reflect adequately on the complexities of hate crimes outlined above, nor are they effectively cognizant of the dangers of overbroad legislation. Most documents follow a benevolently superficial approach expressed for example by the "Prosecuting Hate Crimes: A Practical Guide", published by OSCE-ODHIR, and the International Association of Prosecutors (OSCE-ODHIR 2014, 16), holding that "hate crimes are criminal acts where the victim is targeted because of her or his group identity ... Almost any crime contained in a penal code can be a hate crime." The aforementioned British Association of Chief Police Officers' tactical guidance (ACPO 2005) also follows a victim-based definition by describing hate crimes as "any incident perceived by the victim to be motivated by hate or prejudice." (And even the aforementioned Uniform Crime Reporting Program-document contains references to such categorization.)

Concluding remarks

This article pointed to the various ways legal policy can be misguided in the labyrinth of identity politics, minority protection, and penal populism. It was argued that states should adopt hate crime legislation, as this now is part of the international standard for good and progressive criminal justice. It was also asserted that hate crimes should be conceptualized as a minority protection mechanism, which should not protect identity, but identifiable vulnerability on the group level, and that in the legislative language a thorough enumeration of the protected characteristics is warranted by rule of law requirements. It was specifically argued that hate crimes should not be applicable in interethnic conflicts when members of minority communities are perpetrators and the victims are members of the majority – adding that hate crimes may not be applicable in all conflicts when race, ethnicity or nationality are involved, and that the exclusion of certain groups or types of conflicts does not amount to discrimination or the denial of citizenship, as all offenders are ought to be sanctioned under generally applicable criminal law. It was also contended that the proliferation of protected characteristics, is where identity politics turn into a form of penal populism. It was furthermore argued that victimization should not be conceptualized based on self-identification, but on the perpetrators' (or the wider community's) potential perception and classification, and the view held by international courts, reports, etc, was reiterated that the systematic underpolicing of hate crimes amounts to institutional discrimination.

REFERENCES

- Aaronson, Ely. 2014. From Slave Abuse to Hate Crime: The Criminalization of Racial Violence in American History. Cambridge University Press.
- ACPO. 2005. Hate Crime: Delivering a Quality Service: Good Practice and Tactical Guidance. London: Home Office Police Standards Unit.
- Ahn Lin, H. 2009. "Race, Bigotry, and Hate Crime: Asian Americans and the Construction of Difference." In Hate Crime: The Victims of Hate Crime, edited by Barbara Perry, 65–84. 3. Westport: Praeger Publishers.
- Al-Hakim, M. (2015). Making a Home for the Homeless in Hate Crime Legislation. Journal of Interpersonal Violence, 30(10), 1755–1781.
- Altschiller, Donald. 2015. Hate Crimes: A Reference Handbook. 3rd ed. Contemporary World Issues. Santa Barbara, California: ABC-CLIO.
- Atak, Idil, Delphine Nakache, Elspeth Guild, and François Crépeau. 2018. "Migrants in Vulnerable Situations' and the Global Compact for Safe Orderly and Regular Migration." Queen Mary School of Law Legal Studies Research Paper 273/2018.
- Bakalis, Chara 2017. The victims of hate crime and the principles of the criminal law, Legal Studies, 37 (4), 718–738.
- Bárd, Petra. 2014. "A Gyűlölet-Bűncselekmények Hatékony Üldözésének Társadalmi Feltételrendszere." In A Büntető Hatalom Korlátainak Megtartása: A Büntetés Mint Végső Eszköz. Tanulmányok Gönczöl Katalin Tiszteletére, edited by Andrea Borbíró, Éva Inzelt, Klára Kerezszi, Miklós Lévy, and Léna Podoletz, 29–40. 1. Budapest: ELTE Eötvös Kiadó.
- . 2017. "What Is Behind the Low Numbers of Hate Crimes in Hungary?" Newsletter of the European Society of Criminology 2017/1: 10–11.
- Bean, Philip, ed. 2017. Hate Crime: Critical Concepts in Criminology. London: Routledge.
- Blake, Michael. 2001. "Geeks and Monsters: Bias Crimes and Social Identity." Law and Philosophy 20 (2): 121–39.
- Bottoms, Anthony. 1995. "The Philosophy and Politics of Punishment and Sentencing." In The Politics of Sentencing Reform, edited by Rod Morgan and Chris Clarkson, 1st ed., 17–49. Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Carmody, Niamh, Carr, James, Enright, Shannen, Haynes, Amanda and Schweppe, Jennifer (2015) 'Out of the Shadows' Legislating for Hate Crime in Ireland: Preliminary Findings, Irish Council for Civil Liberties 2015
- Carr, James, Haynes, Amanda and Schweppe, Jennifer, 2017, Hate crime: an overview of significance and relevance to Irish sociology, Irish Journal of Sociology Vol. 25(1) 73–83
- Chakraborti, Neil, ed. 2010. Hate Crime: Concepts, Policy, Future Directions. Cullompton, Devon: Willan.
- Chakraborti, Neil, and Jon Garland. 2009a. Hate Crime: Impact, Causes & Responses. 2 vols. SAGE Publications Ltd.
- . 2012. "Reconceptualising Hate Crime Victimisation through the Lens of Vulnerability and 'Difference.'" Theoretical Criminology 16 (4): 499–514.
- . , eds. 2014. Responding to Hate Crime: The Case for Connecting Policy and Research. 1st ed. Bristol: Bristol University Press.
- DESA. 2003. "Report on the World Social Situation, 2003. Social Vulnerability: Sources and Challenges." A/58/153/Rev.1 ST/ESA/284. New York: United Nations. <https://undocs.org/A/58/153/Rev.1>.
- Dombos, Tamás, Eszter Jovánovics, Eszter Kirs, Balázs M. Tóth, and Márton Udvari. 2014. "Law Enforcement Problems in Hate Crime Procedures. Experiences of the Working Group Against

- Hate Crimes.” Working Group Against Hate Crimes, 1–16.
http://gyulotellen.hu/sites/default/files/ejk_casesummary.pdf.
- ECRE. 2017. “Vulnerability in European Asylum Procedures: New AIDA Comparative Report,” 1–58. http://www.asylumineurope.org/sites/default/files/shadow-reports/aida_vulnerability_in_asylum_procedures.pdf.
- European Commission. 2016. “Proposal for a Directive of the European Parliament and of the Council Laying down Standards for the Reception of Applicants for International Protection (Recast).” COM(2016) 465 final. Brussels: European Commission.
- Fineman, Martha Albertson. 2010. “The Vulnerable Subject: Anchoring Equality in the Human Condition.” In Transcending the Boundaries of Law: Generations of Feminism and Legal Theory, 1st ed., 177–91. London: Routledge-Cavendish.
- Funnell, Corinne and Garland, Defining hate crime internationally: issues and conundrums, In: The Globalization of Hate: Internationalizing Hate Crime?. Edited by Schweppe, Jennifer and Walters, M. Austin (Eds.),; 2016. Oxford University Press
- FRA. 2013 Fundamental Rights-Based Police Training: A Manual for Police Trainers. Luxembourg: Publications Office of the European Union.
- Gaál, Ilona. 2010. “Rasszizmusért Elítélt Miskolci Romák - Az Önmaga Ellen Fordult Törvény [Roma Sentenced for Racism: The Law Turning against Itself].” Magyar Narancs, December 2, 2010.
- Garland, Jon. 2011. “Difficulties in Defining Hate Crime Victimization.” International Review of Victimology 18 (1): 25–37.
- . 2017. “The Victimization of Goths and the Boundaries of Hate Crime.” In Hate Crime: Concepts, Policy, Future Directions, edited by Neil Chakraborti, 1st ed., 40–57. Willan.
- Garland, Jon, and Neil Chakraborti. 2012. “Divided by a Common Concept? Assessing the Implications of Different Conceptualizations of Hate Crime in the European Union.” European Journal of Criminology 9 (1): 38–51.
- Gerstenfeld, Phyllis B. 2004. Hate Crimes: Causes, Controls, and Controversies. Thousand Oaks: Sage Publications, Inc.
- Godzisz, Piotr. n.d. “Racing Race: Should Sexual Orientation Be Protected by Hate Crime Laws? Lessons from Poland.” A Journal of the Joint Faculty Institute of Graduate Studies, University College London. UCLfacesRACEISM: Past, Present, Future 1 (0).
- . 2019. “The Europeanization of anti-LGBT hate crime laws in the Western Balkans, Crime, Law and Social Change 71:291–306.
- Godzisz, Piotr and Pudzianowska, Dorota. Do some identities deserve more protection than others? The case of anti- LGB hate crime laws in Poland. In: The Globalization of Hate: Internationalizing Hate Crime?. Edited by Schweppe, Jennifer and Walters, M. Austin (Eds.),; 2016. Oxford University Press
- Gomez Cervantes, Andrea, and Cecilia Menjivar. 2018. “Mass Deportation: Forced Removal, Immigrant Threat, and Disposable Labor in a Global Context.” In The Handbook of Race, Ethnicity, Crime and Justice, edited by Ramiro Martínez, Meghan Hollis, and Jacob I. Stowell, 1st ed., 527–47. Wiley Handbooks in Criminology and Criminal Justice. Hoboken: John Wiley & Sons, Inc.
- Goodall, Kay. 2013. “Conceptualising ‘Racism’ in Criminal Law.” Legal Studies 33 (02): 215–38.
- Grear, Anna. 2007. “Challenging Corporate ‘Humanity’: Legal Disembodiment, Embodiment and Human Rights.” Human Rights Law Review 7 (3): 511–43.
- . 2013. “Vulnerability, Advanced Global Capitalism and Co-Symptomatic Injustice: Locating the Vulnerable Subject.” In Vulnerability: Reflections on a New Ethical Foundation

- for Law and Politics*, by Martha Albertson Fineman and Anna Grear, 41–60. London: Routledge.
- Hall, Nathan, Abbee Corb, Paul Giannasi, and John G.D. Grieve, eds. 2015. The Routledge International Handbook on Hate Crime. 1st ed. New York: Routledge, Taylor & Francis Group.
- Harel, Alon and Parchomovsky, Gideon, 1999. On hate and equality, The Yale Law Journal Vol. 109, No. , pp. 507-539
- Hate Crime Working Group. 2013a. “A Gyűlölet-Bűncselekmények Elleni Munkacsoport Véleménye a Rendőrség Nyomozó Hatóságainak Hatásköréről És Illetékességéről Szóló Rendelet Tervezetéről,” 1–2. http://gyulotellen.hu/sites/default/files/hataskorirendelet_2013-06-05.pdf.
- . 2013b. “Szakmai anyagok [WWW Document].” 2013. <http://gyulotellen.hu/szakmai-anyagok>.
- Haynes, Amanda, Schweppe, Jennifer: Internationalizing hate crime and the problem of the intractable state: the case of Ireland, In: The Globalization of Hate: Internationalizing Hate Crime?. Edited by Schweppe, Jennifer and Walters, M. Austin (Eds.),: 2016. Oxford University Press
- HCLU. 2012. “Romas Sentenced for Hate Crime Against Hungarians.” Hungarian Civil Liberties Union, 2012. <https://tasz.hu/cikkek/romas-sentenced-for-hate-crime-against-hungarians>.
- . 2013. “Those Racist Roma Again.” Hungarian Civil Liberties Union, 2013. <http://tasz.hu/node/3543>.
- Herek, Gregory M., and Kevin Berrill, eds. 1992. Hate Crimes: Confronting Violence Against Lesbians and Gay Men. Newbury Park: Sage Publications.
- Heyes, Cressida. 2016. “Identity Politics.” In The Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy, edited by Edward N. Zalta, 2016th ed. Metaphysics Research Lab, Stanford University..
- HHC. 2011. “General Climate of Intolerance in Hungary.” Hungarian Helsinki Committee. http://helsinki.hu/wp-content/uploads/General_climate_of_intolerance_in_Hungary_20110107.pdf.
- Hruschka, Constantin, and Luc Leboeuf. 2019. “Vulnerability: A Buzzword or a Standard for Migration Governance?” Population & Policy Compact Policy Brief 20: 1–4.
- Hudson, David L. 2009. Hate Crimes. Point/Counterpoint. New York: Chelsea House.
- Iganski, Paul. 2001. “Hate Crimes Hurt More.” American Behavioral Scientist 45 (4): 626–38.
- . 2008. “Hate Crime” and the City. Bristol: Policy Press.
- Iganski, Paul, and Elizabeth Burney, eds. 2002. The Hate Debate: Should Hate Be Punished as a Crime? London: Profile Books in association with the Institute for Jewish Policy Research.
- Iganski, Paul, and Jack Levin. 2016. Hate Crime: A Global Perspective. Oxon: Routledge.
- Index.hu. 2013a. “Halál a Magyarokra! – Fordulat a Verekedő Romák Tárgyalásán [Death to Hungarians!].” Index.Hu, June 4, 2013.
- . 2013b. “Másfélszeres Büntetés a Sajóbábonyi Romáknak [150 Percent Increase of Penalties for the Sajóbábony Roma].” Index.Hu, September 30, 2013.
- IOM. 2017. “International Dialogue on Migration 2017: Understanding Migrant Vulnerabilities: A Solution-Based Approach Towards a Global Compact That Reduces Vulnerabilities and Empowers Migrants. Background Paper.” Palais des Nations, Geneva, July 18.
- Jacobs, James B., and Kimberly Potter. 2001. Hate Crimes: Criminal Law & Identity Politics. Studies in Crime and Public Policy. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Jenness, Valerie. 2007. “The Emergence, Content, and Institutionalization of Hate Crime Law: How a Diverse Policy Community Produced a Modern Legal Fact.” Annual Review of Law and Social Science 3 (1): 141–60.

- Jenness, Valerie, and Ryken Grattet. 2004. Making Hate a Crime: From Social Movement to Law Enforcement. New York: Russell Sage.
- Juhász, Borbála, and Enikő Pap. 2016. Backlash in Gender Equality and Women's and Girls' Rights. Women's Rights & Gender Equality. Policy Department for Citizens' Rights and Constitutional Affairs Directorate General for Internal Policies of the Union.
- Kelly, Robert J., and Office of International Criminal Justice, eds. 1993. Bias Crime: American Law Enforcement and Legal Responses. 2nd ed. Chicago: Office of International Criminal Justice, University of Illinois at Chicago.
- Kirs, Eszter. 2018. "A Brief Reflection on the Impact of the Universal Periodic Review on the Efficient Investigation of Hate Crimes in Hungary." Corvinus Journal of International Affairs 3 (3): 21–27.
- KSH (Hungarian Central Statistical Office). 2013. "A Népeesség Anyanyelv, Nemzetiség És Nemek Szerint [Population According to Native Language, Nationality and Gender]." www.ksh.hu/nepszamlalas/docs/tablak/ter.
- Lawrence, Frederick M. 2002. Punishing Hate: Bias Crimes Under American Law. Cambridge: Harvard University Press.
- LESS-CSMU. 2015. Hate Crime Data Collection Guidelines And Training Manual. Vol. 3.
- Levin, Jack, and Jack McDevitt. 1993. Hate Crimes: The Rising Tide of Bigotry and Bloodshed. New York: Plenum Press.
- . 2002. Hate Crimes Revisited: America's War Against Those Who Are Different. Boulder: Westview.
- Macioce, Fabio. 2018. "Group Vulnerability, Asymmetrical Balance, and Multicultural Recognition: Group Vulnerability." Ratio Juris 31 (4): 469–84.
- Magyar Köztársaság Legfelsőbb Bíróság Bfv.III.87/2011/5. 2011.
- Malloy, Tove H. 2014. "National Minorities Between Protection and Empowerment: Towards a Theory of Empowerment." Journal on Ethnopolitics and Minority Issues 13 (1): 11–29.
- Mason, Gail. 2013. "Victim Attributes in Hate Crime Law: Difference and the Politics of Justice." British Journal of Criminology 54 (2): 161–79.
- Mathis, Stephen. 2018. "Motive, Action, and Confusions in the Debate over Hate Crime Legislation." Criminal Justice Ethics 37 (1): 1–20.
- Newburn, Tim, and Paul Elliott Rock. 2004. Living in Fear: Violence and Victimization in the Lives of Single Homeless People. London: LSE Mannheim Centre for Criminology.
- O'Doherty, Tamara. 2011. "Victimization in Off-Street Sex Industry Work." Violence Against Women 17 (7): 944–63.
- OSCE-ODHIR. 2014. Prosecuting Hate Crimes: A Practical Guide. Warsaw: OSCE-ODHIR.
- Perry, B. 2007. "Hate Crime." British Journal of Criminology 47 (5): 842–44.
- Perry, Barbara. 2001. In the Name of Hate: Understanding Hate Crimes. New York: Routledge.
- . , ed. 2003. Hate and Bias Crime: A Reader. New York: Routledge.
- . , ed. 2009. Hate Crimes. Vol. 5. Praeger Perspectives. Westport: Praeger Publishers.
- Perry, Barbara, and Paul Iganski, eds. 2009. Hate Crimes: The Consequences of Hate Crime. Hate Crimes 2. Westport, Conn.: Praeger.
- Perry, Barbara, and Frederick M. Lawrence, eds. 2009. Hate Crimes: Responding to Hate Crime. Hate Crimes 5. Westport, Conn.: Praeger.
- Pratt, John. 2007. Penal Populism. 1st ed. London: Routledge.
- Richardson, Diane, and Hazel May. 1999. "Deserving Victims? Sexual Status and the Social Construction of Violence." The Sociological Review 47 (2): 308–31.
- Ryken, Grattet, and Valerie Jenness. 2000. "Examining the Boundaries of Hate Crime Law: Disabilities and the 'Dilemma of Difference.'" Crim. L. & Criminology 91: 653–97.

- Schweppe, Jennifer. 2012. "Defining Characteristics and Politicising Victims: A Legal Perspective." Journal of Hate Studies 10 (1): 173–98.
- Schweppe, Jennifer, Amanda Haynes, and Mark A Walters. 2018. "Lifecycle of a Hate Crime: Comparative Report." Dublin: ICCL.
- Schweppe, Jennifer, and Mark Austin Walters, eds. 2016. The Globalisation of Hate: Internationalising Hate Crime? 1st ed. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Sherry, Mark. 2010. Disability Hate Crimes: Does Anyone Really Hate Disabled People? 1st ed. Burlington: Ashgate.
- Simons, Kenneth W. 2002. "Does Punishment for 'Culpable Indifference' Simply Punish for 'Bad Character'? Examining the Requisite Connection between Mens Rea and Actus Reus." Buffalo Criminal Law Review 6 (1): 219–315.
- Solanke, Iyiola, 2011, Infusing the Silos in the Equality Act 2010 with Synergy, Industrial Law Journal, Volume 40, Issue 4, pp. 336–358
- Swiffen, Amy. 2018. "New Resistance to Hate Crime Legislation and the Concept of Law." Law, Culture and the Humanities 14 (1): 121–39.
- Timmer, Alexander. 2013. "A Quiet Revolution: Vulnerability in the European Court of Human Rights." In Vulnerability: Reflections on a New Ethical Foundation for Law and Politics, edited by Martha Albertson Fineman and Anna Grear, 147–70. Surrey: Ashgate Publishing, Ltd.
- UNIEMI. 2014. LIGHT ON: Investigating and Reporting Online Hate Speech. Training Manual. United Nations Interregional Crime and Justice research Institute.
- "Vulnerabilities." 2015. European Network to Reduce Vulnerabilities in Health (blog). December 23, 2015. <https://mdmeuroblog.wordpress.com/about/vulnerabilities/>.
- Walker, Savannah. 2017. "Policing Hate: The Problematic Expansion of Louisiana's Hate Crime Statute to Include Police Officers." La. L. Rev. 78: 1413–46.
- Weinstein, James. 1992. "Some Further Thoughts on 'Thought Crimes.'" Criminal Justice Ethics 11 (2): 61–63.
- Wellman, Christopher Heath. 2006. "A Defense of Stiffer Penalties for Hate Crimes." Hypatia: A Journal of Feminist Philosophy 21 (2): 62–80.
- "Working Group Against Hate Crimes (GYEM)." 2013. May 9, 2013. <http://gyuloletellen.hu/en/about-us>.
- Young, Iris Marion. 1997. "Asymmetrical Reciprocity: On Moral Respect, Wonder, and Enlarged Thought." Constellations 3: 340–63.

NOTES

ⁱ Besides the activities of the EU Fundamental Rights Agency (FRA), see Directive 2012/29/EU of 25 October 2012 establishing minimum standards on the rights, support and protection of victims, specifically making references to victims of hate crime, Council of the European Union (2013), Council conclusions 2013/ JHA of 6 December 2013 on combating hate crime in the European Union and the Council Framework Decision 2008/913/JHA of 28 November 2008 on combating certain forms and expressions of racism and xenophobia by means of criminal law requires Member States.

ⁱⁱ For a lack of hate crimes laws in Ireland consider Carr et al 2017, and Carmody et al 2015.

ⁱⁱⁱ Miskolci Járásbíróság (repeated I. decision) 22. B. 2418/2011, Miskolci Törvényszék (repeated appellate decision) 3. Bf. 2023/2012

^{iv} Miskolci Törvényszék (trial court) 4. Fk. 1188/2011, Debreceni Ítéltábla (appellate decision) Fkf. I. 498/2013.
v Magyar Köztársaság Legfelsőbb Bíróság Bfv.III.87/2011/5. 2011

^{vi} Kúria Bfv.II.590/2012/18. 2012; Magyar Köztársaság Legfelsőbb Bíróság Bfv.III.87/2011/5. 2011, 5) also see LB-H-BJ-2011-106.

^{vii} 3/2015 “büntető elvi döntés” on Debreceni Ítéltábla Fkhar. II. 248/2014. See Bfv.II.590/2012/18 and EBD 2015 B.3.

^{viii} Application No. 57325/00

^{ix} The notion of ‘vulnerability’ or ‘vulnerable persons’ is also used in legal instruments, including the ‘Regulations and Directives of the Common European Asylum System (CEAS).

^x The principle of non-retroactivity, a fundamental component of the rule of law, is expressed in Article 15 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights: „No one shall be held guilty of any criminal offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute a criminal offence, under national or international law, at the time when it was committed...”

^{xi} Balázs v. Hungary (Application no. 15529/12), Király and Dömötör v. Hungary (Application no. 10851/13), R.B. v. Hungary (Application no. 64602/12)

^{xii} ECRI’s Policy Recommendation No. 11 recommends that law enforcement records racist incidents, which are defined as “any incident which is perceived to be racist by the victim or any other person”.